to fall for someone

ندش ی سک هتفیش ی سک هب نتخاب لد

DEF

to begin to feel romantic love for someone — usually suddenly or unexpectedly

Fall for someone is gentler and more vulnerable than 'fall in love' — it suggests the involuntary nature of attraction. You do not choose to fall; you find yourself already falling. Rich in nuance for emotional English.

to be swept off your feet

to be overwhelmed by romantic feelings — to be so strongly and unexpectedly attracted to someone that you lose your usual composure or control

Swept off your feet is a vivid physical metaphor — the feeling is so strong it removes your footing. It implies speed, intensity, and often surprise. Very common in English romantic language and song lyrics.

to get butterflies

مکش رد ی بصرع و زیگانان اچی ه ساسح ا ن تشاد مکش رد ه ن اورپ

to feel a nervous, fluttery sensation in your stomach — caused by excitement or romantic anticipation

Get butterflies is the physical experience of romantic excitement. The metaphor captures the light, fluttery feeling of early attraction — when you are about to see someone you like, or just after you have met them. It is used almost exclusively for pleasant, excited nervousness rather than fearful anxiety.

to have a crush on someone

ن آ زاربا ن ودب بلغا ، یسک ه ب یوق هناقشاع تی باذج ساسح ا یسک ه ب ن تخا بلد

to feel strong romantic attraction to someone — typically used when the feeling is not yet mutual or openly expressed

Have a crush is the early-stage romantic verb. A crush is intense but often one-sided, short-lived, or unexpressed. Adults use it too, but it carries a slightly youthful, innocent flavour. The phrase implies you have not told the person and that the feeling might not be reciprocated. It is the stage before falling in love.

to go on a date

ندرک تاقالم هناقشاع تروص هب یسک اب ننتشاذگ هناقشاع رارق

to meet someone romantically — a planned social meeting with a potential partner

Go on a date is the standard phrase for a romantic meeting. In English-speaking contexts, the concept of dating is more formalised and explicit than in some other cultures: you ask someone on a date, you are 'dating' someone, and these are understood shared activities. Knowing this cultural vocabulary is useful for speaking about relationships in English.

to pop the question

ندادچاودزا داهنشپی ندرک یراگتساوخ

DEF

to propose marriage — to ask someone to marry you

Pop the question is the idiomatic way to say 'propose'. The informality of 'pop' contrasts with the seriousness of the act, making the phrase feel warm and approachable rather than formal. It is always understood to mean a marriage proposal — not any other type of question.

to settle down

ندرک رارقرب دهعتم و رادی اپ یگدنز کی نترفرگ مارآ

DEF

to establish a stable, committed life — typically involving a long-term relationship, home, and routine

Settle down is the life-stage phrase. It implies choosing stability over adventure: moving in with a partner, getting married, stopping dating around. For many speakers it carries a mild sense of giving something up (freedom, spontaneity) while gaining something (security, depth). The phrase is often used in questions: 'Are you thinking of settling down?'

to break up with someone

to end a romantic relationship — to tell someone that the relationship is over

Break up with is the standard phrase for ending a relationship. In English, break up is almost always used for romantic relationships (not friendships or business relationships). The preposition 'with' specifies who you ended things with. It is always the active party who breaks up with the other — the passive party 'gets broken up with'.

DEF

to be romantically committed to someone who lives far away — maintaining a relationship across geographical distance

Long-distance relationship (LDR) is the full phrase; it is often shortened to 'long-distance'. Being in a long-distance relationship is increasingly common and culturally well-understood in English. The phrase implies the shared work of maintaining connection over distance: scheduled calls, visits, and trust.

DEF

to treat someone in a way that shows they matter to you — through small attentions, gestures, and care

Make someone feel special is the love language phrase. In relationships, people often speak about feeling seen and valued. This phrase captures the actions — not grand gestures but consistent small ones — that communicate 'you matter to me'. In English it is used to describe both romantic and non-romantic care.
